

Kuni Invasive Species Data Analysis

Abstract

Alex DeGolia Environmental managers face major challenges related to not only how to implement projects, but also how to communicate their value to the public. Effective communication can mitigate public opposition while increasing public and political support for environmental management. In this study, we evaluate how to communicate the benefits of environmental management in ways that achieve these goals. To do so, we field a framing experiment that utilizes a two (economic, ecological) by two (gain, loss) factorial design to evaluate how the public responds to messages highlighting different potential benefits of an invasive species management project. We find that ecological messages lead to significantly more support for invasive species management than economic frames and that loss frames are more effective than gain frames. We also find that treatment responses differ across a number of covariates including political party identification and environmental concern. Results suggest that the public is more concerned with intrinsic environmental value than economic value and that people are more concerned with preventing further environmental degradation than helping promote environmental health.

Variable Analysis

Independent Variables

Primary Analysis Using the Following: Demographic variables: race, gender, age (continuous), age (squared, for non-linear effects), rural/urban, occupation Resource variables: education, HH income Political variables: party ID, ideology Environmental variables: NEP, animal rights

Demographic Variables

Race

469 non-white or latino, 601 non-latino white. This translates to 56.2% white, 20.1% hispanic/latino, 17.3% asian, 5.9% black, 3.7% american indian, 2% pacific islander (combined 43.8% non-white or latino).

CA population: 38% non-hispanic white, 39% hispanic, 13% asian, 6% black, <1% each pacific islander & american indian, 3% mixed race

US population: 76% white (incl hispanic), 17% hispanic (any race), 14% black, 6% asian, 2% american indian, <1% pacific islander
